My dementia is progressing and I realise we need extra help

If you or a loved one have been living with dementia for some time and been able to manage between you, it can be hard to accept that you need extra help, as symptoms progress. You may be struggling with your everyday routine, withdrawing from once favoured activities, even putting your own safety – or that of others – at risk.

While everyone's journey with dementia is different, these are typical signs of the middle stages of the disease and for many, mark the moment when changes to care arrangements become necessary.

So it may be a comfort to know that, with the right support, a person with mid-stage dementia can continue to lead a contented, safe and fulfilling life, hopefully for many years to come.

Make a positive change
Dementia is an umbrella term for over a hundred types of progressive disease that affect the brain. Everyone that lives with it experiences it differently. The middle stages can be the longest and most challenging, both for the person with the condition and for those who care for them. The person may be increasingly confused and disorientated, mixing up day and night or become prone to wandering. They may struggle to recognise or remember the names of family and friends. Bathing, dressing and eating may be challenging and they might easily become anxious, agitated or even aggressive.
Faced with these symptoms, and without the right support, the quality of life for everyone involved often suffers.

This can be distressing for the person with dementia, who may be aware that things are not quite as they used to be. You may have real fears about their safety when they’re left alone.

A nursing home was once the only option for the expert, professional care that’s needed. Now there is an alternative, that’s more personalised to your needs, avoids the upheaval and expense of moving to strange surroundings and can offer a better quality of life.

Best of all, it’s available in the reassuring comfort of home.
What is specialist live-in care for mid-stage dementia and how can it help?

Live-in care involves a professional carer moving in to a spare room to provide one-to-one, round-the-clock support, fitting around existing routines and assisting with everyday tasks and activities.

In the middle stages of dementia, specialist care moves at your pace, adapting as needs increase. There will be physical support, should you need help with bathing, dressing and eating, as well as encouragement with gentle exercises that maintain strength and mobility.

A trained carer will be especially sensitive to your emotions and respond to any signs of distress, often finding a shared, simplified language that enables you to communicate and express your feelings.
A higher standard of care for greater peace of mind

Drawing upon the latest techniques and guided by an expert team, your carer will provide a blend of emotional, physical and practical care that’s completely unique to you.

They’ll often work in partnership with an Occupational Therapist if you need any special equipment or adaptations to make home life easier.

Helping you feel calm and safe, they’ll also ensure your day is sprinkled with activities and reminiscences that stimulate your mind and body.

Finding the right care provider at this stage will allow you to enjoy an improved sense of wellbeing and a better quality of life. It can also offer great peace of mind to your family.
The Good Care Group are specialists in dementia care and the only live-in provider rated ‘Outstanding’ across the board by the Care Quality Commission.

With the support of our Consultant Admiral Nurse and Occupational Therapist, we offer both nurse and OT-led services to people living with mid-stage dementia. Experts in the condition, they will tailor your care around you, focusing on what makes you happy and avoiding causes of distress.

Our carers are among the most highly trained and supported in the country. They’re fully employed by us and backed by a dedicated manager and 24/7 emergency response team should it ever be needed.
As pioneers in dementia care, we use the latest technology to monitor your health proactively, reducing unnecessary hospital admissions and addressing any medical issues before they become acute.

For many, our care is life changing. You’re far less likely to have a fall, pick up a urinary tract infection or be prescribed antipsychotic drugs than a care home resident.

In April 2019, The Good Care Group became the only dedicated live-in care provider to achieve the ‘Outstanding’ rating in all five categories of the CQC inspection.
